New Hampshire and the Great War: Spring Lecture Series

On the 100th anniversary of America's entry into World War I, the New Hampshire Historical Society presents its annual spring lecture series focusing on the Granite State's commitment to the war.

The series is held on five consecutive Thursday nights beginning April 13 and running through May 11.

New Hampshire made some surprising contributions to the war effort. Over 20,000 men from the state served in the U.S. military during the months America was involved in the conflict, and hundreds of them gave their lives to the effort. By the time the war ended in late 1918, the world—and New Hampshire—was a very different place than it had been just a few short years before, as America was poised to take its place on the world stage and hovered on the brink of the modern era.

Lecturers include historian Byron O. Champlin, professors Hugh Dubrulle (St. Anselm College) and Christopher Capozzola (Massachusetts Institute of Technology), and Society Library Director Sarah Galligan, covering the initially conflicted loyalties of New Hampshire residents, the ground war, the development of air power, relief workers, and changes on the home front.

Attendees must register for the entire series. We are not currently accepting registrations for individual lectures.

Admission is free for New Hampshire Historical Society members; nonmembers are welcome to attend for a fee of $50, which includes a one-year membership in the Society. To register by telephone with a credit card, call Membership and Visitor Services Coordinator Wendy Olcott at 603-856-0621. To register by mail, use this registration form and return with payment (if applicable) to Spring Lecture Series, New Hampshire Historical Society, 30 Park Street, Concord, NH 03301.
